"I-I guess I'll have to accept your binders."

"Fine! Come up on the front seat so we can talk. I have many things I want to tell you."

As they drove slowly along the boule-vard Robert talked to her as if he had known her always.

"I'm scared to tell you how much meeting you has meant to me," he said

"And to me, too," she answered simply, "You—you're so sympathetic and you understand."

"And I'm going to bring the car here every night in the hope that fel-low'll come and you'll run out and hide in it again. Or, maybe now that you've found out that I'm a friend of Mrs. Denton's, you'd let me call sometimes and then when he wanted to come you could tell him you had an-ther engagement."

"All right," she smiled, "and thank you ever so much-you've been too good

"You crazy boy. I told you you would. Now go to bed and tell me about it in the morning."

With a joyful little squeak the girl next door buried her head in her pillow.

"So he feels that way, too," she kept saying unbelievingly as she finally dezed off to sleep.

"It's great to have you to confide in, and I don't know how I'd ever get along without you."

"You'll learn how pretty soon after you find the right girl. You'll ferget all about that middle-aged friend you used to run to with your troubles," laughed Mrs. Denton.

"But I never expect to find the right girl and you know I shall never forget you as long as I live."

"Pooh! I've heard that a thousand times before and from as many discouraged your people; but don't you worry, she's probably waiting for you right around the corner this minute."

"She's had twenty-eight years to do it is a standard the standard the corner that the standard th

"She's had twenty-eight years to do it in and hasn't yet, so why should she be just around the corner, as you put it, tonight?"

'But why not tonight as well as any other night?' she asked placidly.

"Well, we'll soon see—as it's now —'' (he draw out his watch and glanced at it) 'ten minutes of eleven there isn't much time left.''

"All right," she smiled, "and goodnight once more."

night once more."

In the warm handshake he expressed his gratitude, and opening the big front door went out into the soft summer night.

"Dear boy," muttered Mrs. Denton as she turned back into the library.
Foulsine went down the broad steps rapidly and jumped into his car. In a moment he was whizzing along the boulevard toward home. His talk with Mrs. Denton encouraged him as it always did, and he felt decidedly optimistic as he slipped into his garage and turned the engine off.

"Oh, where am I?"

He looked quickly about the garage as he heard the frightened voice of a

The girl next door heard the funny "pinking" sound and went to her window to see what it could be. he asked, his eyes growing big with admiration as he took in the details of the girl's appealing little face.

"I—I must have fallen asleep," she confessed at last.

"Something tells me you did." he laughed, "but how did you get in the car in the first place? By mistake, I suppose."
